

The Welsh Government have announced yesterday (03/12/2020) that travel will now be allowed into Wales from Tier 1 and Tier 2 areas of England from 6pm Today (Friday 04/12/2020). Please read the screenshot from the Welsh Governments frequently asked question regarding holidaying to wales below;

I do not live in Wales, can I travel to Wales for a holiday or to visit family and friends?

Travel in to Wales from tier three areas in England, level three and four areas in Scotland and from Northern Ireland is not allowed at present, without a reasonable excuse, for example travelling for work purposes. Visiting family and friends (other than as part of an extended household) or having a holiday is not currently considered a reasonable excuse, although we hope to be able to welcome you in the not too distant future.

Visitors from other parts of the UK are not prohibited in law from entering Wales. But as coronavirus cases are high in Wales, we encourage everyone to think carefully about our own lives and what changes we can make to reduce our risk. This includes thinking carefully about travelling. The virus thrives wherever and whenever we are in close contact with others.

In particular, we strongly advise that people living in tier two areas in England or areas in Scotland in level two do not travel to Wales because of the wider risk of catching and spreading the virus to areas of lower risk.

All FAQs can be found on: Coronavirus regulations from 4 December: frequently asked questions | GOV.WALES

Please also use the UK governments postcode checker to ensure that you are in tier 1 or 2 before travelling: Find out the coronavirus restrictions in your local area - GOV.UK \(www.gov.uk\)

Also, please ensure that you fill in the track and trace form.

We will try and keep you up to date on current guidelines, however please ensure you check your guidelines and The Welsh Governments guidelines before travelling as they are constantly changing.
